

When I first met Kak Caca back in Agrabah, I only saw her from afar since I was still in the Blackman Division. My first impression was simply that she seemed like a good person. Then Wonka started, and as I got to know her more, my first impression turned out to be completely true: she really is that good, honest, and kind.

She has always been a wonderful presence in my life. If you were sitting right here in front of me today, Kak, I would tell you that you are one of the reasons I'm still here in this world. You were there for me at my lowest. You inspired me to stay strong, kind, and honest and most importantly, to never give up, even when everything and everyone seems to be against you. You showed me that you can still choose to be a good person through it all.

I've always admired how, even when life was falling apart around you, you remained loving and held onto your faith in Allah. That's something I still struggle with myself, and it's honestly one of the things I respect and love most about you.

My biggest regret will always be not being able to see you one last time before you left. But I need you to know how deeply supportive, honest, loyal, funny, and incredible you were. I never want you to think for a second that you weren't enough, or that you were ever a bad friend.

I love you, Kak Caca, and I always will. You are the most amazing friend I've ever had in this life. I miss you, and I pray you are at peace and resting easy over there.

P.S there's an actual letter that I wrote but I will give it to you when you're here.
